According to a new study, "unofficial" gatherings — those that aren't held in one of those fancy parties that brands want to market — have a way of ruining the festivities. The new study, by researchers from the University of South Australia, the University of Illinois, the University of Toronto and the University of Maryland, analyzed four years of data on more than 22,000 parties and compared that to daily rainfall. The team found that almost one-fifth of parties would lead to more than a few drops of rain, and that half of the parties in the U.S. resulted in some rainfall. And, for the most part, the more rain-heavy parties took place in lower-income neighborhoods, according to the researchers. I guess you could argue that the rain — or, more accurately, the heavy showers — was necessary for the champagne glasses to be rinsed, but still, it's a bummer that the group-time fun will be ruined by such a minor inconvenience. Researchers have long known that, in certain cases, there's a correlation between increased rain and reduced air quality, but the new study adds a new wrinkle: It suggests that the rain caused by a party may very well be caused by the group of people who attend. The team first analyzed data from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's National Climatic Data Center. Then, the researchers used algorithms to determine whether the amount of rainfall at a certain spot on a given day was the result of local wind, or simply rain falling down. If it's just the rain falling, then local wind may have had something to do with it. However, the study's results didn't quite prove that to be the case. For one thing, there's the issue of weather being so complicated that even with all of the new technology at scientists' disposal, it's hard to pinpoint the root cause of something that may be out of anyone's control. But that's still no excuse to get all of your friends together and ruin a perfectly good celebration. Me: I'm just like my grandma. You can make me do anything! She's just always been really overprotective, like she's worried about me growing up. So, I'm kind of scared to leave home, even though I can do whatever I want. Her: Yeah, I'm a little the same way. I still live with my parents, but I want to move out because I want to be independent 82157476af
